ROBOTS One of the questions we were most frequently asked when we first began working with the ISC was why there were no robots for the safety critical device. Well, it turns out there are quite a few, and we've had the good fortune to work with them all. They're used, primarily, for the highest reliability R&D, but can just as easily be used for the manufacturer – in the case of ASV and Link (which we also work with), it's used in production. The robots are being introduced to the world of safety critical devices for a number of reasons. In the world of research and development, they're used to eliminate: Need for hands, so no touching of electrical connections Narrow tolerance requirements Volume of material Volume of fluid Difficulty with critical assembly We use robot processing mainly to make parts very reliably. We also use them for the production of our design aids: Taking a part from a design aid to a real production tool Making sure the design aid is working properly before moving to a real process Taking the part out of its package and placing it in a real assembly jig Doing a final quality check In the production tool, we use robots to remove material from the end mill tooling – our CNC milling machine. The revolution in manufacturing technology over the past 30 years has replaced men with mechanical components to a level we've never seen before. There are simply too many things to try and do with the same hand. Robots are not only more precise and repeatable, they also create a faster and more timely product. With the ISC, we're convinced that one day robots will be a fundamental part of the manufacturing process. It's not only a game-changer for industrial production, but it's also a step for the advancement of the product development process. We've worked with the robot platform, BOSCH VAYTA, for more than ten years; they're an amazing piece of technology.
